Redman is one of those very, very special books which it is a privilege to read it. One would think that words are too small to hold something as devastating as

New Orleans post Katrina and Jean seemingly effortlessly unfolds the landscapes of outward and inward devastation. With the greatest of skills she shows small little details and sketches with a masterful eye a picture which in its bleakness is nearly too much and leaves the reader aching, with at least an inkling of understanding for what happened and deep appreciation for a story-teller able to translate visual and emotional desolation into language. And on this canvass she paints her story and what a masterpiece this is: a perfectly imperfect counterpoint. Rural innocence tainted and regained, beauty found and lost, anger and redemption, justice in all that injustice. And Micky being just Micky and so much more. The grande dame has given us one hell of a book with glimpses of heaven and all I can say is: go get it! This one leaves a water mark on your soul.
